Mrs. Kussink Says She Obtained a Dispen-nation from Him, and Her Father Swears to that Effect She is Thirty-Sve, But Everybody Says She Looks Twenty-three. Toube Kuseluk, a widow with golden hair, once owned a follypop shop in Division street, near Attorney. Although she is 35 years of age, her enemies acknowledge she does not look more than 23. Her oldest boy is 12 years of sge, and she has two younger. At the age of 20 she mar-ried her late husband, who had a nephew, Mayer

Kuseluk, then 9 years old. After six years of married life her husband died. The widow Kuseluk found no truer comforter than Nephew Mayer, then 15, and a lad of bright promise. After a period of apprentic ship he moved to Hoboken and opened a tin and crockery ware shop. His Sundays, however, were spent in the Division street store. Many or his pennies passed over the counter, and in return he received a wealth of affection that was more than auntly. He is not a well-favored youth physically, but he had a business ability which astounded his uncle's widow. She saw that with cultivation he would in time come to be rich enough to be appointed on a committee of seventy. Such gifts ought not to be wasted, and Mayer was urged to take a helpmate. As he is an impressionable young man, and each day his aunt looked more youthful, and her hair, cortainly, was more golden, he asked her to be his assistant in the tin and crockery ware cay his anti-looked more youthful, and her to be his assistant in the lin and crockery ware business.

The Hebraic law says that no man shall marry his father's brother's wife, but then a law 3,500 years or so old makes but little difference when a widow of 45 who looks only 23 makes up her mind to marry. Mrs. Kuseluk sought Chief Rabbi Jacob Joseph, at 219 Henry street, and came away from the chief rabbi with an amended law. Her father, Abraham Goldberg, of 127 East Broadway, doubset the truth of the widow's statements and sought the rabbi in person. Once, twice, thrice, he asked the rabbi whether his daughter could marry her nephew. Yes, was the answer each time. This Goldberg was the answer each time. This Goldberg was to be fore Julius Blumberg, notary public, of 17 Canai street.

Secure in the special interpretation of the law Widow Kuseluk sold out her shop and prepared for the wedding. She even went so far as to make a new dress, an extraordinary concession, when it is considered that on the east side wedding dresses are commonly hired for the occasion. Two men from the chief rabbi came to her, she says, and told her she could marry.

When the Pike street congregation heard of the wedding, that the neighbors expected to see the police reserve trot around the corner at any time. There are eligible bachelors and widow with a candy shop. Then there were the fathers, and in these hard times a man must look after his own. A committee visited Chief Rabbi, and the was induced, it is said, to change his mind. But it was too late. Mayer, the luaband, asserts that he had never visited the Chief Rabbi, and did not know the marriage was against the law.

Last Tuesday the following notice was inserted in the Jewtah Record:

JACON JOSEFH, Chief Rabbi.

Mr. and Mrs. Kuseluk have not separated and declare they will not, notwithstanding the chief rabbi selection. It is said that this is the first time in the history of the Jews of New York city that such a case has arisen. Chief Rabbi Joseph says that such being the fact he decided to make an example of the couple. As the publication is of a religious nature he declares that Mayer cannot sue him for libel.

Mrs. Kuseluk's maiden name was Toube Gollbrodsky. Her brother David had the courts change the name to Goldberg, the insurance companies refusing to insure his barber shop because his name ended in "sky." All the family followed his example and selected new names. The Golibrodskys and the Kuseluk's came from the same province in Russia.

The reform of the currency bids fair to take for a while at least, the place of the silver question as a topic of discussion. The scheme for the leans of circulating notes by both national and State banks otherwise than upon the pledge of Government bonds, which was approved by the recent convention of bankers at Baltimore, and is therefore, known as the Baltimore plan, has, with some modifications, received the sanotion, first, of the Comptroller of the Currency. next, of the Secretary of the Treasury, and, finally, of the President, who has recommended it in his message. A bill embodying it will probably, if it can be prepared in time, be sub-mitted either to the Senate or to the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress, and although it is extremely unlikely that such a bill can be passed at this session, it will none the less serve as a peg upon which to hang debate in the newspapers and among citi-That our currency needs reform is universally gens, as well as in the national legislature. conceded, but as to what the reform should be, and how it should be accomplished, a complete chaos of opinion prevails. There is a radical disagreement as to fundamental principles and a multitude of conflicting ideas as to details. In all sections of the country errors are entertained as to the true character and functions of money, which it will take a long time to remove, and which, until they are removed, will greatly obstruct reform.

In the eyes of bank officers, and of the com mercial community generally, the chief defect of our present currency is what is called its want of elasticity. The volume of silver coin, silver certificates, and legal tender notes being fixed by law, that of national bank notes by the requirement of the deposit of Government bonds as security, and that of gold by the production of the mines which yield it, an unusual demand for currency at a given point can be met, now, only by drawing it from another point and thus causing a scarcity there. For example, when the wheat, corn, and cotton crops are ready to be marketed, the requisite currency to be employed in bringing them from the farmers and other Eastern financial centres, with the effect of producing at those centres a rise in the rates of interest, a contraction of loans, and a fall in the prices of commodities and securities. To remedy this evil the bankers assembled at Baltimore, and those who agree with them unite in recommending that the requirement of Government bonds as security for bank circulation be abrogated, and that all banks, both State and national, shall be allowed upon certain conditions to issue circulation against their own assets, supplemented by a deposit of a certain amount of legal tender notes as a safety and a redemption fund. The theory of this plan is that when any special demand for currency arises the banks will make a special issue of notes to supply it, and that as soon as this demand ceases the banks will retire the notes it has called out. Thus the quantity of currency available will, it is assumed, never be either deficient or excessive, and there will never be at any point either a monetary stringency or monetary plethora.

Were the function of currency exclusively that of facilitating exchanges, any scheme which would insure the expansion and contraction of its volume at the pleasure of bank officers would be unobjectionable and might be useful. But currency serves the additional purpose of measuring the value of commodities, and, since its value in relation to those commodities is determined by its volume, any change of its volume changes its value also, and, consequently, impairs its stability as a measure of values. In this aspect inelasticity in a currency is a merit and not a defect. The advocates of elasticity complain that when an increased amount of wheat, corn, and cotton is offered for sale a dearth of currency ensues, prices fall, and the rate of interest rises. This natural and logical result they desire to prevent. In effect, they take the same ground that is taken by the advocates of free silver coinage, who demand that, since the quantity of wheat, corn, cotton, and other commodities annually pro-duced has of late years immensely increased, while the quantity of gold in use as money has remained substantially unchanged, and thus a general fall in prices has been caused, either gold shall be discarded in favor of silver, of which the production has increased to as great an extent as that of other commodities, or that silver shall be added to it so that in either way prices shall be raised to their former level. It is extremely doubtful whether any system can be devised which will contract the volume of currency when it has once been expanded. but if it can, such an arbitrary contraction would be resented by the sellers of commodities and by the borrowers of money as much as they resent the same result when it is produced by natural causes. Before the Baltimore plan can be adopted, therefore, it must first be determined whether this varying value of currency is desirable, and whether it can be secured. Again, the idea prevails extensively in the agri-cultural districts of the West and the South that the chief business of a bank should be the lending of money to borrowers who desire to use it for the improvement of their property. In the debates in Congress upon the removal of the prohibitory 10 per cent, tax upon State bank circulation, this idea was very prominent. It was repeatedly pointed out by the opponents of the tax that, while money was piled up in New York and could not be loaned even at ridiculously low rates of interest, it was not to be had by farmers and planters at any rate whatever. This was attributed to the want of local banks, and it was contended that the remedy was the establishment of State institutions, free from the re-strictions of Federal laws in the issue of circulation, to supply the wants of the agricultural community. Evidently, banks conducted upon this theory could not be expect-ed to redeem their notes on demand even in legal tenders much less in gold. They would lend the notes first to farmers and planters on the security of their land and live stock. The borrowers would next pay them out in the purchase of implements and fertilizers and in the erection of buildings, to people who would use them in turn in the payment of their debts, and so they would eventually come into the hands of persons who would want them redeemed, either in legal tenders or in coin Then trouble would begin. The banks which issued the notes would have plenty of mortgages on real and personal estate, but they could not immediately convert them into lawful money and for want of this money they would have to fail and be wound up. A bank currency redeem-able on demand would, therefore, fail to satisfy Southern and Western requirements.

This matter of redemption is also left by the original Baltimore plan of bank currency in a singularly incomplete condition. The plan seems to have been devised to provide for no more than the occasional failures of banks which may occur in the ordinary course of events, leaving out of consideration the extraordinary demands for redemption which may follow a drain of gold to Europe or be caused by a financial panic. A safety fund of five per cent, and a redemption fund of another five per cent, both in legal tender notes, would manifestly be insufficient in a crisis like that of last year, and even the 30 per cent, fund proposed by Secretary Carlisie, also to be composed of legal tenders, might prove inadequate. A great deal is said about making bank currency safe, but ultimate safety and immediate convertibility are two very different things. Of the ultimate safety of the legal tender promises of our Government there can be no doubt, but if they should cease to be redeemed on demand in gold they would lose much of the value as currency. Still less would a bank currency redeemable only after the collection of the assets of the banks issuing it be available in a crisis in which a large number of them should be forced to suspend payment. To be as good as gold a currency must be redeemable on demand in gold, and the fund of gold applicable to this purpose must be so large as to dissipate all fears of its sufficiency under any circumstances.

The disposal of the outstanding legal tender notes is another matter to be settled before we AFFE T. - described on Sunday, Dec. 9.
If her residence, 100 West Tist at., Margaret.

The transfer books of the company will close at three bates now amount to $500,000,000, and, at ten A M on the transfer books of the state of the flowing the transfer can have any satisfactory entrency reform.

OESTACLES TO CURRENCY REFORM. ury. They must be reissued as fast as they are redeemed. If to them and to the $600,000,000 of silver, silver certificates and national bank notes, which the Government practically undertakes to maintain at par with gold, should be added an indefinite amount of bank notes, no matter how well their ultimate payment may be secured, gold redemption, already difficult, will become well-nigh impossible. Unless the volume of legal tenders is reduced that of bank notes cannot safely be increased. Now, to reduce the volume of legal tenders they must either be redeemed out of a surplus revenue or be funded into interest-bearing bonds. At present there is no surplus revenue and no probability of any for a long time to come, and funding is our only resource. To fund the whole of the legal tenders even at 214 per cent. per annum would cost the country $12,500,000 a year, and the proposition to impose this burden upon tax-payers for the benefit of the banks would be sure to be defeated in Congress. Since then the legal tenders cannot be retired, we should rather seek to reduce the volume of bank cir-culation than to increase it, for, by withdrawing the present $200,000,000 of that kind of paper currency, we should insure the use in its place of a corresponding amount of Government paper, and to that extent lessen the difficulty of maintaining gold payments.

These are not all the obstacles that the framers of a scheme for currency reform have to deal with, but the mention of them suffices to exhibit the thorny nature of their task, and ought to enlist in their behalf our most char-Itable consideration. MATTHEW MARSHALL.
